The fat grafting procedure typically takes place in an outpatient setting. The surgeon will first harvest fat from the patient's body, typically from the abdomen or thighs. The fat is then processed and purified before it is injected into the face.

The surgeon will use a fine needle to inject the fat into the desired areas of the face. The amount of fat injected will depend on the patient's individual needs and goals.

After the procedure, the patient may experience some swelling and bruising. This is normal and will typically subside within a few days. Most patients can return to their normal activities within a few days.

The results of fat grafting can be seen immediately after the procedure. However, the final results will not be fully visible for several weeks or months, as the fat needs time to settle and mature.

Fat grafting can provide long-lasting results, with some patients seeing improvements that last for years. However, it is important to note that fat grafting is not a permanent solution, and the results may gradually fade over time.

Fat grafting is a safe and effective way to improve the appearance of the face. This technique can be used to correct a variety of facial concerns, including wrinkles, scars, and volume loss. Fat grafting is a versatile procedure that can be used to achieve a variety of results, from subtle improvements to more dramatic changes.

If you are considering fat grafting for aesthetic facial surgery, be sure to consult with a board-certified plastic surgeon to discuss your individual needs and goals.
