The book begins with the boy asking his mother if he can have a girlfriend. His mother tells him no, and the boy is confused and upset. He doesn't understand why his mother would say no, and he tries to convince her to change her mind.

The mother explains to the boy that she doesn't want him to have a girlfriend because she doesn't think he is ready for a relationship. She tells him that he needs to focus on his studies and his friendships, and that he will have plenty of time to date when he is older.

The boy is still upset, but he eventually agrees to respect his mother's wishes. He goes to school and tries to focus on his studies, but he can't stop thinking about why his mother said no.

One day, the boy is talking to his friends about girlfriends, and one of his friends tells him that his mother doesn't want him to have a girlfriend either. The boy is surprised, and he asks his friend why. His friend tells him that his mother doesn't want him to have a girlfriend because she is afraid that he will get hurt.

The boy starts to think about what his friend said, and he realizes that his mother is probably afraid of the same thing. He understands that his mother just wants what is best for him, and he decides to accept her decision.

The boy goes home and talks to his mother about what he has learned. He tells her that he understands why she doesn't want him to have a girlfriend, and that he respects her decision. The mother is relieved, and she tells the boy that she loves him very much.

The boy and his mother hug, and the boy realizes that acceptance and inclusion are important. He knows that everyone deserves to be loved and accepted, no matter who they are.
